Is Universal Basic Income the way forward?

Universal Basic Income: a regular payment unconditionally delivered to all, without means test or work requirement. It is intended to negate the need for most benefits. Fascinating, at the beginning of some serious piloting, but controversial at both ends of the political spectrum.

The meeting on Saturday 3 February (listed on front page) gives an opportunity to explore the background and thresh the issues with a panel of speakers with differing views. These include Peter Kelly, Director of the Poverty Alliance, Peter Dean, a public finance economist, and our own Annie Miller.

Whether attending or not, you can study the following:

We should be doing it already?

Struggling with technology in 1492 For and from all ages (it's not just us)

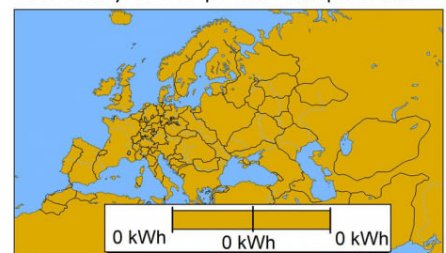

Master Leonardo da Vinci's kitchen is a bedlam. Lord Ludovico Sforza told me that the effort of the last months had been to economize upon human labour, but now, instead of the twenty cooks the kitchens once employed, there are closer to two hundred persons crowded up the floors and walls – and none of which seemed behaving in any manner useful or for which it was created. At one end a great waterwheel, driven by a raging waterfall, spewed and spattered forth its waters over all who passed beneath and made the floor a lake. Giant bellows, each twelve feet long, were suspended from the ceilings, hissing and roaring with intent to clear the fire smoke, but all they accomplished was to fan the flames, to the detriment of all who needed to negotiate by the fires—so fierce the wandering flames that a constant stream of men with buckets was employed in trying to quell them, even though other waters spouted forth on all from every corner of the ceilings.

And throughout this stricken area wandered horses and oxen, the function of which seemed to be no more than to go around and round, dragging Master Leonardo's floor-cleaning devices – performing their tasks valiantly, but also followed by another great army of men to clean the horses' messes. Elsewhere I saw the great cow grinder broken down with half a cow still stuck out of it, and men with levers essaying to move it out.

From a 1490s report describing the chaos after the Duke of Milan employed a 30-year old Da Vinci to manage the castle kitchen. From an article by Michelle Legro (Lapham's Quarterly, 2011), which attributes it to an apparently unpublished piece of writing by artist Sabba de Castiglioni.

What we're reading

The Sewing Machine by Natalie Forgie. The history of one Singer sewing machine, 1911-2016. Two families, three secrets, four generations, millions of stitches. Absolutely gripping.

Our Tumblr site of the month is Michelle Legro's My Daguerreotype Boyfriend. Its first post featured dapper young Russian doctor-author Anton Chekhov (1860-1904).

But Russia is far away. Several closer possibilities are revealed by a search on 'Scotland'. Mr Laing (front page) is a fine example of Hill and Adamson's ground-breaking early photography in Edinburgh from 1843 (Scottish National Gallery).
